Ireland and Portugal - the history (Source: Dept of Foreign Affairs)

Irish relations with Portugal can be traced back to the mists of antiquity. Archaeological evidence from the Iron, Bronze and Megalithic periods charts the earliest contacts between the Iberian Peninsula and Ireland. Recent DNA analysis also suggests that the Portuguese-Iberian peoples were ancestors to the Gaelic Irish, dating from the last Ice Age.

Today, Ireland and Portugal work together for peace and prosperity - both through multilateral organisations like the United Nations and as member states of the European Union. We are like-minded Atlantic facing partners with a strong shared commitment to democracy and the rule of law.

Merchants from the west of Ireland have been trading with their Portuguese counterparts since the 15th century, controlling the lucrative wine trade between Ireland and the Iberian Peninsula. Wine, silver, textiles, ceramics and leather were traded in return for Irish fish, beef, wool and timber.

Even before a trade relationship was established, records indicate that Irish pilgrims have been travelling to Portugal since at least the 1200s, even transporting a relic of St. Brigid, which to this day is venerated in St John the Baptist Church in Lisbon.

In the 15th century, the Irish Dominican Sisters founded the Irish Dominican College in Belém. An enduring testament to the longevity of the Portuguese-Irish relationship continues to flourish in the suburb of Belém - the Convent and School of Our Lady of Bom Sucesso, which operates to this day.

Today, for well over 4000 Irish people, Portugal is the place that they call home, and for over 800,000 more annually, Portugal is the place they come to visit.
